Trading The Inducement Step By Step

How to spot early market traps and enter after liquidity sweeps.

01 What It Is And Why It Matters

- An inducement is early bait formed after a structural turn, tempting eager traders into entering too soon.
- Early buyers place protective stops just below that first small pullback, creating concentrated resting liquidity.
- The market sweeps that minor level to clear those stops before moving in the intended direction.

02 How To Spot It On The Chart

- First, identify a market turn where price breaks cleanly above previous structure.
- Next, mark the first minor pullback low that forms immediately after the structural break.
- Wait for price to drop down through that minor low, sweeping liquidity before looking for your entry.

03 How To Do It In TradingView

- Open your four hour chart to gain a clear view of structural swings.
- Place your cursor directly on that first pullback low.
- Press Alt plus H on your keyboard to drop a horizontal reference line across that exact level.

04 The Common Mistake And The Professional Alternative

- Amateurs rush into the first shallow dip because they fear missing the expanding move.
- Professionals leave the initial pullback alone, treating it purely as liquidity bait for retail stops.
- If price sweeps through the level and keeps falling without rejection, the setup is void and you do nothing.

Checklist

- [ ] Confirm a clear structural market turn on your four hour chart
- [ ] Identify the very first pullback low formed after the turn
- [ ] Press Alt plus H to mark that level horizontally
- [ ] Refrain from taking an entry on that initial shallow dip
- [ ] Wait for price to sweep cleanly below that marked horizontal line
- [ ] Look for strong rejection after the low is taken before placing an order
